

CHOICES YOU WON'T REGRET

Let's admit it. At some point, we've all made money choices we wish we could change.

Chances are, some of these bad money moves were relatively minor. Like buying a pair of jeans that didn't fit and then realizing you couldn't return them because they were marked final sale. Scoring big savings on a second-hand vehicle that ended up costing you twice as much in repairs. Or purchasing an antique Shaker-style crib the baby never slept in. Ever.

Other bad money moves may have been major ones that caused a great deal of stress. Like buying more house than you could afford (or needed). Falling in love with a stock (that didn't love you back). Or not saving enough for a rainy day and then learning your boss had hired her son. To replace you.

Don't be embarrassed

Nobody's perfect. And we all make mistakes. Why? Because we're human and humans have a bad habit of letting emotions drive their decisions – especially when it comes to money.

Humans also make assumptions about the future; assumptions that are often wrong. As human beings, we also tend to look at each of our choices in isolation, forgetting the other choices we have already made and the future ones we're considering, while giving little thought to their future implications.

Don't focus on your past mistakes

After all, you're only human. But, if you are going to make Better Money Choices™ going forward, you do need to accept responsibility for your choices – both past and future. And then move forward, instead of stressing yourself out over your previous missteps.

Good or bad, each of your money choices either brings you closer to feeling in control of your financial future or further away from achieving your goals. And that too, is a choice.
